activities. The person who would want to sell the condoms would be saying we know that there might be sexually transmitted diseases, so we want to keep them to a minimum. There are people on this floor who would be opposed to a clean needles program, which would make needles available to people who inject drugs, so that there would be a greater opportunity to prevent the spread of HIV, but those kind of programs would be opposed. We know that if somebody is diagnosed HIV-positive, that virtually is a death sentence. By the same token, Senator Janssen, we know that each of us is under a death sentence because we've all got to die, but there are some things that can hasten that event. HIV is deemed to be one of them. So we would oppose the clean needles program. We are opposed to sex education in the schools, which would be a preventative. We are opposed to condom distribution, which would be a preventative. But then it comes to this evil, which according to what Senator Dwite Pedersen stated, devastates families, causes the money to take wings and fly away, which results in perhaps the loss of a house. And instead of rectifying the evil, you all want to put a band-aid on it. It's like taking a tub full of manure that has the strongest stench you can imagine, throw in a little skunk oil to enhance it, and then you get one of those little bathroom sprays, and you go and you spray a little of that around it, and that's suppose to purify the air and make everything all right. You need to get rid of the manure. This gambling that is supported and endorsed by the state is the evil that needs to be rooted out, but you're too afraid to do that. As a matter of fact, a majority of you support it. So what is this? A little balm to soothe the conscience that nags every now and then? Not really. A particular person had a relative who encountered a problem based on compulsive gambling, so all of a sudden somebody's conscience was twinged, not for the sake of the hundred and thousands of people who have the same problem, but because somebody that senator knew had gotten involved, and that usually is the only time this Legislature undertakes to do anything that could, by the stretch of the imagination, be labeled good. What they are doing, Senator Hillman, and I don't know if they are doing it in your neighborhood or your part of the state, they're putting these huge billboards up, that glare to anybody who drives by, that the state is running gambling scam and we want your money, too, and now there are $11 million available for you. All you've got
